

House Democrats to forward Trump impeachment articles, setting stage for Senate trial

Patrick Martin
13 January 2020

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi announced Friday that she would begin the process of transmitting articles of impeachment against President Trump to the Senate this week. She sent a “Dear Colleague” letter to every House Democrat saying the meeting of the House Democratic caucus set for Tuesday morning would take the final steps.

Pelosi initially indicated that the caucus meeting would discuss which House members would serve as impeachment managers and schedule the vote to select them—the final action required before the beginning of a Senate trial of Trump—leading to reports that the trial could begin as early as Thursday.

But on Sunday, in an interview on the ABC program “This Week,” she seemed to hedge her bets, saying that at the caucus meeting, “we would vote to send them over, and we will determine in our meeting when we send them over.” That could delay the opening of the Senate trial until later in the month.

Whatever the exact timing, Pelosi evidently failed to obtain any concessions from Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell on issuing new subpoenas for new witnesses and documents beyond those already used by the House Judiciary Committee in drafting the two articles of impeachment adopted by the House on December 18.

McConnell announced last week that he had 51 Republican votes in the Senate to begin the trial without new witnesses or documents, and to revisit the issue after House impeachment managers and attorneys for President Trump presented their cases. Given the 53-47 Republican majority, at least four Republican votes would be required to change the rules governing the trial.

Senate Democrats have named four officials as witnesses they want to be called: acting White House Chief of Staff Mick Mulvaney, former National Security Adviser John Bolton and two lower-level aides, Robert Blair and Michael Duffey. All four would likely testify about Trump’s decision to withhold military aid from Ukraine rather than his demand that the Ukrainian government announce an anti-corruption investigation into a potential Democratic opponent, former Vice President Joe Biden.

The Democrats’ list of witnesses underscores the right-wing character of the charges brought in the House impeachment inquiry. It confirms that the real driving force of impeachment is not the professed indignation of the Democrats over Trump’s use of his presidential powers to gain an advantage over a political rival, but rather the concerns within the CIA, Pentagon and State Department over the disruption of a longstanding effort to use Ukraine as a base of military operations and provocations against Russia.

Pelosi reiterated these concerns in her interview on ABC with George Stephanopoulos. She seemed to concede in advance that Trump would not be removed from office by the Senate, but declared that “we have confidence in our case, that it’s impeachable, and this president is impeached for life, regardless of any gamesmanship on the part of Mitch McConnell.”

She continued, “Everything that he has done, whether it’s in Syria vis-a-vis the Turks, whether it’s been in Ukraine in terms of withholding assistance as they try to fight the Russians, his denial about their role in our election then and now—all roads lead to Putin. And sometimes I wonder about Mitch McConnell too, what’s he—why is he an accomplice to all of that.”

While Trump declares that the congressional Democratic leadership could not be briefed in advance about the assassination of Iranian General Suleimani because they would have leaked it—implying that they are traitors—Pelosi suggests that not only Trump, but also Mitch McConnell are agents or “accomplices” of Russian President Vladimir Putin.

Once a Senate trial begins, the upper chamber will operate under unusual procedures, including sessions six days a week with all other business set aside until the trial’s conclusion. Chief Justice John Roberts will preside and senators are barred from speaking or even asking questions. Instead, they must submit questions in writing to Roberts, who will read them out.

The five senators who are currently candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination, Michael Bennet, Cory Booker, Amy Klobuchar, Bernie Sanders and Elizabeth Warren, would essentially be taken off the campaign trail for the duration of the Senate trial. Four of the five, all but Bennet, are actively contesting the Iowa caucuses, where voting takes place on February 3.

McConnell has insisted on applying the same rules to the trial of President Trump in 2020 that were used in the 1999 Senate trial of President Bill Clinton, which gave 24 hours of trial time to the House impeachment managers and an equal amount of time for the president’s defense, followed by 16 hours of questioning by senators, conducted through the chief justice.

In the Clinton trial, the Senate voted to subpoena three witnesses, who had already testified before the House. In the case of Trump, the Democrats are seeking the testimony of witnesses who refused to testify voluntarily before the House committees that conducted the impeachment inquiry.

There is a particular focus on John Bolton, who was described by other witnesses as adamantly opposed to any delay in the release of military aid to Ukraine. At one point Bolton reportedly described Trump’s efforts to obtain political assistance from Ukraine as a “drug deal.”

Bolton unexpectedly announced January 6 that he would be willing to testify before the Senate if he were subpoenaed. He refused to testify voluntarily before the House, and the House Intelligence Committee decided not to issue a subpoena after Bolton’s lawyer suggested he would fight it in court.

President Trump declared Friday that he would invoke executive privilege to block Bolton’s testimony in the event the Senate decided to subpoena him. He claimed this was not because Bolton’s testimony would be damaging, but to preserve confidentiality “for the sake of the office.”

Several Republican senators considered to be possible defectors on a procedural vote, including Susan Collins of Maine and Mitt Romney of Utah, have expressed interest in having Bolton testify at the trial.

To contact the WSWs and the Socialist Equality Party visit:

wsws.org/contact