Around 330,000 people took part in over 450 May Day demonstrations and rallies across Germany on Wednesday. Around 100 opponents of the genocide in Gaza were excluded from the union demonstration, which had about 14,000 participants, and were separated from the protest by the police. Although they advocated uniting the working class worldwide against imperialist war, their chants of “Free Palestine” and the description of the Israeli war in Gaza as genocide were deemed “not welcome,” according to a DGB spokesperson, and would be “excluded from the demonstration.”

At the demonstrations, members of the Sozialistische Gleichheitspartei (Socialist Equality Party, SGP), which had about 14,000 participants, condemned the massacre in Gaza and NATO’s proxy war in Ukraine. They advocated uniting the working class worldwide against imperialist war. They promoted the online May Day rally of the International Committee of the Fourth International and called for the freedom of Ukrainian socialist Bogdan Syrotukhin, who was arrested and imprisoned for his defence of the unity of the Russian and Ukrainian working class. DGB officials then filed criminal charges for “incitement of hatred against the people,” whereupon the police began an investigation into the people. Members of the DGB youth organisation had previously tried to remove Palestinian flags from participants. The DGB and its member unions are notorious for their open support of Germany’s pro-war policy. In February, for example, Europe’s largest industrial union, IG Metall, involved in the German government’s preparations for war.”

In Stuttgart, SGP European election candidate Ratnamaheson declared: “The official slogan of the DGB (German Trade Union Confederation)—more pay in free time, justice—is a lie. The trade unions and the DGB systematically organising cuts in real wages and support of Germany’s pro-war policy. In February, for example, Europe’s largest industrial union, IG Metall, involved in the German government’s preparations for war.”

While many demonstrators wanted to fight against capitalism and war, the trade union bureaucracy reaffirmed its support for the government’s pro-war policy and joined forces with the police to crack down on opponents of war. In Berlin, for example, opponents of the genocide in Gaza were excluded from DGB rallies and persecuted by the police, while in Frankfurt am Main, the DGB celebrated May Day in front of the “Römer,” Frankfurt City Hall, which was decorated with Ukrainian and Israeli flags. The previous evening, regional DGB leader Philipp Jacks together with Frankfurt’s Mayor Mike Josef (SPD) had hoisted the DGB flag there. Mike Josef also invited to speak at the May Day rally.

The officials tried to surround themselves with striking Linerando drivers, who are confronted with inhumane working conditions at the billion-dollar delivery service. The demonstration in the Kreuzberg and Neukölln districts with more than 10,000 participants was marked by vocal opposition to the genocide in Gaza. Four thousand people took part in

In Berlin, according to Tagesspiegel, around 30,000 people took part in over 20 peaceful demonstrations. The demonstration in the Kreuzberg and Neukölln districts with more than 10,000 participants was marked by vocal opposition to the genocide in Gaza. Four thousand people took part in

However, by holding the rally under Israeli and Ukrainian flags, the DGB also made it clear how firmly it stands on the market square only drew 2,000 participants, side of the state and the capitalists, and that it particularly including many trade union officials as well as activists from SPD, Left Party and the Maoist MLPD.

In Stuttgart, there was a violent confrontation with police, personally lending a hand to tear down Palestinian flags. When during which 167 demonstrators were arrested and their march failed, other trade union officials intervened and simply broken up. Several hundred participants carried banners against the carrying of Palestinian flags, announcing: “You the Gaza war and Palestinian flags, as well as placards with one minute to leave the demonstration. There will be no slogans against social inequality and war. A very large police discussion: The minute is running.”

contingent, including mounted officers and police dogs, accompanied the march.

After a short time, the police command apparently used the pretext of several “unauthorised” banners as the reason to intervene violently. Around 150 participants at the front were separated from the rest of the demonstration and kettled. Because the remaining 400 or so participants did not allow themselves to be pushed away, but remained where they were and expressed their solidarity with those being kettled, the police declared the previously authorised demonstration over and broke it up.

The police claimed they had been “suddenly” attacked with pepper spray, as well as “roofing batons with screws” and other forms of “striking tools.” A police report, which was immediately disseminated uncritically in the media, spoke of 5 injured police officers and three injured police horses.

However, according to Der Spiegel, a spokeswoman for the protest organisers rejected this and explained late on Wednesday evening that if police officers had been injured by pepper spray, then this was “due to the massive use of irritant gas from their own ranks.” In addition, the police had categorised confiscated materials—such as the supports for large banners and signs on wooden slats—used as tools for attacks.”

The videos circulating of the confrontation show pepper spray being used exclusively by police officers, along with several mounted police officers driving their horses into the front of the demonstration. The demonstrators have so far reported “95 injuries as a result of police attacks,” and of injuries caused by the use of police batons as well as eye and skin irritation from pepper spray.

Although these clarifications paint a completely different picture of the events, Stuttgart Mayor Frank Nopper (Christian Democratic Union, CDU) spoke of “rioters and violent
